A Family Affair

Linda Nesenson has been part of A Chance To Grow's family – and we've been part of hers – since 1991. Her journey mirrors ours, as this story demonstrates.

Linda's second son, Matthew, born in 1988, began having issues with speech and movement while he was still a toddler. By the time he was in kindergarten, the impact was obvious: "He was so overwhelmed with everything that was going on," remembers Linda, "he would just laugh and laugh, he didn't know what to do, he couldn't focus, he wasn't following anything. He would go on and on and then all of a sudden, he would just tire himself out and conk out." He was so disruptive to the class, he spent half the day in the hallway on a chair because they didn't know what to do with him.

By the time he was six, his pediatrician had diagnosed him with ADHD and had put him on Ritalin. "It wasn't doing anything, so they just wanted to keep upping and upping the dosage," recalls Linda, "so he developed a tic, eye blinking, and I said, 'no, we're not doing this.' The saving point came when I saw a flyer advertising the Boost Up Program."

This was being offered by New Visions, ACTG's alternative school designed specifically to help children like Matt who had trouble learning. As part of his enrollment process, Matt received a number of assessments he'd never had before. "His pediatrician, he never asked me, 'did he crawl, did he crawl on his tummy, did he creep on his hands and knees?' I had no idea. I had taken him to the eye doctor to have his vision checked and they would tell me his eyes were healthy and that he had 20/20 vision, but at New Visions, where they did the telebinocular screening, I learned that he had depth perception problems, which explained why he didn't want to play catch, he would want you to throw the ball, but he didn't want to catch it.

They also found out his pinch grasp was way off, which explained why he liked to watch you color, but for him to hold the crayon, well...he just wasn't interested."

At the time, New Visions offered the occupational, vision and speech language therapy Matt needed in addition to the Boost Up program, so Linda enrolled him there in 1994. Like Matt, his cousin Ryan had also been diagnosed with ADHD, and he was also enrolled in the school. Linda soon started volunteering in the Boost Up program, and was ultimately hired as an educational assistant in 1998. Her sister, Ryan's mother Teresa, also came to work for the school in the office, her cousin was a paraprofessional, and her husband Gary came to work as a janitor. And so began a family affair.

At the time, New Visions was housed at St. Bridget's and offered Boost Up for children in grades 1-8. Students got Boost Up 5 days a week as part of their daily schedule. The success of the program with those students led the staff to consider ways to bring the program to more children. Hence the Minnesota Learning Resource Center, and the S.M.A.R.T. Program (Stimulating Maturity through Accelerated Readiness Training) came into being. Designed to easily incorporate the Boost Up approach into K-3 and Pre-K classrooms, the program has trained thousands of teachers in Minnesota and across the country, providing countless children with the brain development needed to succeed in school and beyond.

Matthew stayed with the program through the eighth grade. In addition to occupational, speech and vision therapy, Matt and Ryan received brain training via Audio-Visual Entrainment (AVE), which helps people self-regulate emotions. Both boys began to improve. "Matt could handle the group situation, he wasn't sitting in the hallway, he just got more engaged, more involved in what was going on, he could read, he was learning, he was calmer." Linda recalls that Matt's kindergarten teacher had predicted that he would never be able to read. After he had been at New Visions for a while, an educational assistant took him back to that teacher's room, and said "Matthew would like to read something for you." And he did.

Today, Matthew is grown up, steadily employed at a local store for the last seven years, and the father of four-year-old Xander. "If it wasn't for my experience with New Visions, with A Chance to Grow, I think Matt would be out there somewhere, in prison or homeless." That experience helped her recognize early that Xander, like Matt before him, had challenges. "Something was not quite right. The first thing is the speech, it wasn't coming, he's not saying Mama and Dada, he's not playing like a neurotypical toddler would play." When he was two, she told Xander's mom that she should bring him to ACTG for an occupational therapy evaluation. Today, Xander is receiving speech and occupational therapy at A Chance to Grow.

While Matthew left New Visions for middle school, and has since gone on to lead a wonderful life, Linda remained at ACTG. It was her second career, after spending 25+ years in the telephone business, but, she says, "Boost-Up became my first love." Over the years, her involvement has grown and changed, just as the agency has. Eventually, she also worked for the AVE program, Vision program, and as it expanded, the Clinical Services department as a clinical assistant. She has never formally retired because, as she says, this has become a family affair too. "The people here, they mesh so well together. I think it's because the goal is helping children in families, and so many of the people that work here have some sort of relationship with their own families or friends needing services," she says. Because of that shared experience, "the staff feels like family, too."
